The Arboretum has free admission and is open every day of the year, from dawn to dusk.

For a dozen fairy houses hidden throughout the grounds.

The Arboretum is now run jointly by the City of Stamford in Connecticut, and by the Bartlett Tree Experts company, Bartlett in the early 20th century, as a place to grow and observe woody plant specimens from all over the world. Eventually, when the company's research labs moved to North Carolina, the land was sold to the State of Connecticut and opened to the public.

Started in 1913, the Bartlett Arboretum originally served as the research laboratory for Francis A. Bartlett and his company, Bartlett Tree Experts — you've probably seen the trucks — as a place to grow and observe woody plant specimens from all over the world. Eventually, when the company's research labs moved to North Carolina, the land was sold to the State of Connecticut and opened to the public.

Visiting the house, which reopened for tours in 2022 after a two-year hiatus, is a visual revelation that no photograph can capture.

The Glass House arguably became the building that shaped perceptions of modern architectural style from 1948 to 1949, the Glass House arguably became the building that shaped perceptions of modern architectural style.

Eliot Noyes, Landis Gores, and John M. Johansen. All five had studied under Bauhaus founder Walter Gropius at the institute, highlighting both internationally recognized artists and homegrown local talent. Though the organization's mission has changed over the years, the focus on high-caliber exhibitions remains.

Philip Johnson was one of the most influential – and controversial — architects of the twentieth century. He was among a group led by Walter Gropius at the Bauhaus, which produced several of the most influential architects of the century, including Mies van der Rohe, Marcel Breuer, and Philip Johnson himself.
